The friends in Denmark have erected a very neat, though rather unique building. The dimensions are thirty-eight by forty-two feet on the outside. There is a colonnade of four pillars, which are only eight feet in height, the work above them being close and the orchestra projecting over them, which is the only gallery in the house. The desk is also in front. The building is surmounted, first, by a quadrangular tower about five feet high—this by an octagonal one of smaller diameter, extending upward about eight feet, and terminating, like the former, with a cornice. Above this there is a railing, or rather curb, about eighteen inches high, inside of which extend upward eight points, one at each angle of the upper tower. The building, though small, is of sufficient capacity to accommodate the friends in the vicinity for the present. It cost only about six hundred and thirty dollars, and what is the best feature about the building, it is paid for.
