Bereavement.—Our young townsman, Charles S. Siddons, is in deep affliction by the loss of his wife [Theresa], who died last night. Mrs. S. had been ill of a lingering, slowly consuming disease for a year or more, and her friends have watched the progress of the disease with fears that left little room for hope. The event, though not unexpected, is none the less painful to those who were near to the deceased. She leaves one child of tender age, too young to realize its loss. The husband has lost an affectionate wife, the child a kind parent. Both have the sympathy of friends.
