

[Wetmore, Cyrus]

DEATHS.

In Leyden, on the evening of the 29th ult., of the pleurisy, Mr. Cyrus Wetmore, aged 31 years. His funeral was attended the Sunday following, and a numerous and attentive audience manifested their esteem for the departed, in the sincerest tokens of sympathy—while the writer of this discoursed on Rom. viii:38,39.

Br. Wetmore was a man of true moral worth, and had for some time been a believer in the 'Abrahamic faith.' He was a member of the Boonville Universalist society, of which he was also clerk. For some months previous to his illness, he had lived in the utmost happy frame of mind, being cheered by the rays of that gospel which secures life immortal to a world, and testified his sincerity by the fruits of his life, and last, but not least, in the peace of his death. Sacred be his memory!

A sorrowing widow, three orphan babes, and a numerous circle of kindred and friends, mingle their griefs, by this sad bereavement. May God support them!

I cannot conclude this notice without commending the high toned liberality and charity, manifested by Br. Wetmore's own parents and others of his friends, who cheerfully consented that the funeral services should be performed by a Universalist preacher, at the suggestion of the widow, though they were members of other churches. The language of their conduct to the world, is, "Go thou and do likewise!"
